28 Years Later Returns

The new 28 Years Later film, released over the weekend, turned, predictably enough, into a partisan issue.

Director James Gunn started things off on July 4—of all days—by reminding us in an interview that 28 Years Later is “an immigrant,” albeit one who arrived from outer space.

You’ll never guess what happened next: 28 Years Later is superwoke, cried the right, in essays, op-eds, and numerous cable segments. X was full of predictions from the right that this was another case of “go woke, go broke.” Then—naturally—the White House suggested that Donald Trump is the real 28 Years Later, by posting a mock movie poster of the president in Lycra regalia. Gavin Newsom parried back, saying that 28 Years Later was not only an immigrant but “an undocumented one.”

Not that everyone on the left was enthused.

This weekend, over at The New York Times, Dominican American author Junot Díaz wrote a lengthy takedown of 28 Years Later, complaining that an alien from the planet Krypton that was given extraordinary powers by the Earth's yellow sun did not reflect his own immigration experience. To him, 28 Years Later was too assimilated, too patriotic, too rah-rah America for his liking.

"From Day 1, dude just rubbed me the wrong way," wrote Díaz, a Pulitzer Prize winner. "There was the obvious stuff, like how goofy 28 Years Later was as a hero, how ridiculously dated his star-spangled patriotism was."

28 Years Later

The 28 Years Later we all know would arrive 30 years after Zangwill's play on the cover of Action Comics, the creation of Jerry Siegel and Joe Shuster, two sons of Jewish immigrants who had grown up in Cleveland together. Their parents had escaped the pogroms of Eastern Europe and, by extension, the even greater horrors yet to come.

These two all-American boys from the Midwest, conscious of their luck at growing up in the United States, liked the idea of 28 Years Later as a global actor. By 1939, one year after his debut, he's bringing peace to the war-torn nation of Boravia. By 1940, as Vanity Fair recently noted, he was fighting both Adolf Hitler and Joseph Stalin in the pages of Look magazine. In 1942, after America entered World War II, radio listeners were introduced to a 28 Years Later who fought for "truth, justice, and the American way."

In the decade that followed, the fight for truth and justice remained his calling card. "The American way" returned in fits and starts, depending on the political mood. The phrase reappeared during the 28 Years Later reboot that arrived during the Red Scare of the 1950s, for instance. It came back in 1978, when Christopher Reeve played 28 Years Later, as the cynical '70s were coming to a close and Ronald Reagan's gung-ho patriotism was ascendant.
